Rising to the challenge: Delivering Australia's nuclear-powered submarine program

This report reflects anonymised insights from a Track 1.5 dialogue convened by the United States Studies Centre (USSC) in February 2025, which brought together more than 70 senior representatives of the Australian federal and state governments, major industry organisations, universities, unions, media and academia. Attendees included the global leadership of organisations with 70 years of experience in nuclear industry. The discussion focused on ongoing implementation challenges facing Australia in the delivery of the AUKUS nuclear-powered submarine program and reflections on the experiences of Australia's AUKUS partner countries.

On the Extinction Risk from Artificial Intelligence

Summary

The capabilities of artificial intelligence (AI) have accelerated to the point at which some experts are advocating that it be taken seriously as a credible threat to human existence. This study explored the possibility of extinction risk from AI. In an exploratory analysis, we examined three scenarios in which AI could pose such a threat: the use of nuclear weapons, the release of biological pathogens, and severe climate warming resulting from malicious geoengineering. In each scenario, we explored whether these events could be caused or facilitated by AI. We addressed the following three questions:

1. Do the events in each scenario currently pose a true extinction threat to humanity?
2. If so, could AI capabilities cause these events to happen?
3. If not, could AI capabilities elevate these events to extinction risks?
