Out of Ammo: A Two-Year Sprint to Rebuild the American Arsenal and Deter China

The U.S. weapons arsenal has been depleted and no longer has the capacity to deter a Chinese attack against Taiwan. In order to prepare for future conflicts in the South China Sea and elsewhere, the United States should undertake reforms of its defense industrial base to focus on the scaling of precise mass systems.

Delegate to Innovate: Why Acquisition Reform Alone Can't Fix Military Innovation (And How to Succeed Anyway)

Senior Fellow Thane Clare argues that defense innovation failure is caused by the diffusion of decision-making authority across the Department of Defense. He uses the case studies of Admiral Rickover and General Schriever to illustrate how empowering leaders to plan, prioritize, and act protected from bureaucracy enables innovation success.

Gray Zone Attacks Against U.S. Allies and Partners

Crisis Response Playbook no. 3

Responding quickly and effectively to hybrid warfare attacks against U.S. allies and partners is a growing challenge for policymakers. When an aggressor designs an attack to deliberately obscure their identity and avoid triggering a full-scale military response, choosing an approach, as well as securing domestic and international support, becomes uniquely difficult. The United States should develop a range of policy options to protect its treaty commitments, deterrence credibility, and commercial interests, avoiding the risks associated with inaction.
